Are Vegetables for You?

When considering producing vegetables for the first time, you need to evaluate how vegetables will fit your operation. First you need to evaluate the current farming operation to determine what new equipment is needed and what old equipment can be adapted to vegetables. You need to determine how much additional labor is needed, when it is needed and where can you get it.

If a significant amount of new equipment is needed, you should be sure you are looking to produce vegetables over more than one or two years.

Markets for vegetables do exist locally, regionally and internationally but at times it is difficult for the new grower to “break into” these markets. Before planting, you should answer these questions about your potential market:

1. Where is the market?
2. What volume is required?
3. When is the product needed?
4. What quality is desired?
5. What price levels can be reasonably expected?
6. What are the regulations of the market?
7. Can the regulations be satisfied?

After answering the marketing question to your satisfaction, you need to determine if you can reasonably expect to make money from the particular vegetable you are considering.

What will be your:

1. Management requirements?
2. Cost of production?
3. Expected marketable yields?
4. Expected prices?

You should estimate your expected income levels by varying the cost, yields and prices. Using a 10 percent variation in these factors you can determine how sensitive your profits are to slight changes in costs, yields, or prices. At times we become too optimistic in estimating costs, yields, and prices.

Using This Publication

The prices in this publication are from Georgia Agricultural Statistics Service (GASS) reports. Unless otherwise indicated, these prices are FOB, e.g. loaded on the truck at shipping point. The Atlanta wholesale prices are the prices that the wholesaler receives for the product, not what he pays. Farmer prices would be about 20 percent less.

For commodities that are produced over long periods in the state, the primary (spring, summer or fall) season average is indicated at the bottom of the tables. You may want to determine an average for you particular season. Since the price quotes are for the “top of the line” sizes and quality, a blend price is shown for most of the commodities that have multiple sizes or grades.

For determining your yield and cost estimates, computer budgets are available at the county extension office. Printed budgets are also available.

Containers and Weight

Shipping containers for vegetables may vary by commodity, market and season. Standardization has been slow coming, but the fresh industry is moving toward containers that provide better product protection and are easily palletized. The following table lists vegetables that are being grown or may be grown in the southeastern United States. The containers listed are the primary shipping containers reported by the Market News Service.

Southeastern Vegetables

| Commodity | Container¹ | Net Weight (lbs) |
|---|--------------------------------|-----------------------------|
| Beans (round green, pole, and limas) | Bu carton, crate, or hamper | 30 |
| | Crates, 1 1/9 bu | 33 |
| Broccoli | Carton or crate (14 bunches) | 23 |
| Cabbage | 1 4/5 bu carton | 50 |
| | 1 3/4 bu crate | 50 |
| | Mesh sacks | 50 |
| Corn, Sweet | Wbd crate (4 -4 1/2 dozen) | 42 |
| Cucumbers | 1 1/9 bu carton | 55 |
| | (Mediums, 75-90/carton) | |
